

Acceptance and Commitment Therapy Workbook

A seven-chapter client workbook with pre- and re-assessment

Research-informed use. ACT concepts are presented as processes in a psychological-flexibility model. Values are directions for action rather than achievements; defusion changes the relationship to thoughts rather than proving them false.

ABOUT THIS RESOURCE

A structured client workbook that walks through the ACT processes one chapter at a time, each with teaching, reflection prompts and exercises. It begins with a pre-assessment snapshot and ends with a re-assessment so progress can be compared, and adds a cognitive distortions reference and a set of ACT metaphors along the way.

HOW TO USE IT

Designed to be worked in order between sessions, one chapter at a time. The two assessments bookend the work.

Acceptance and Commitment Therapy Workbook · information

ACCEPTANCE AND COMMITMENT THERAPY Acceptance and Commitment Therapy is a unique form of cognitive behavioral therapy that utilizes mindfulness, acceptance, and behavior change strategies to foster mental wellness. Unlike traditional therapy models that focus primarily on symptom reduction, ACT empowers you to accept the reality of your negative emotions while committing to actions that align with your personal values.

This therapy is built on the idea that fighting against our internal experiences, such as feelings, thoughts, and memories, often leads to an increase in psychological suffering. Instead, ACT encourages you to embrace these experiences without judgment and use them as a stepping stone to personal growth. THE SIX CORE ACT PRINCIPLES ACCEPTANCE Learning to accept your thoughts and feelings rather than avoiding or struggling against them.

COGNITIVE DEFUSION Learning to observe your thoughts without getting entangled in them or taking them too literally. BEING PRESENT Fostering mindfulness and awareness of the present moment, without judgment.

Rate your agreement with each statement on a scale from 1 to 5, where 1 is "Strongly Disagree" and 5 is "Strongly Agree". I frequently find myself trying to avoid unpleasant thoughts and feelings. (1-5) I often get swept up in my thoughts, allowing them to influence my actions significantly.

WHERE ARE YOU NOW?

When I experience a negative emotion, my instinct is to try and get rid of it as quickly as possible.

Pre-Assessment

Acceptance and Commitment Therapy Workbook · worksheet

Pre-Assessment I feel like my life is being controlled by my worries, fears, or anxieties. I have a hard time accepting myself as I am, without judgment or criticism. I feel disconnected from my emotions or body sensations—I'm not always sure how I'm feeling. I don't feel like I'm living my life in alignment with my true self or deepest values. I have a hard time tolerating uncomfortable feelings or situations, and I often feel the urge to escape from them. This reflection will serve as your foundation as we delve into the principles and practices of Acceptance and Commitment Therapy. We will revisit this pre-assessment later on to help you track your growth and progress through this journey. Remember, the goal is not to achieve a perfect score but to enhance your psychological flexibility and empower you to live a life that aligns with your core values. Approach this process with patience, openness, and self-compassion.

WHERE ARE YOU NOW?

When faced with a challenging decision, I tend to act impulsively rather than pausing to consider my values.

When I'm feeling emotional pain, I often try to distract myself or "numb" the pain in some way.

Once you've completed this self-assessment, spend some time reflecting on your responses. Are there patterns or recurring themes?

Are there specific areas where you'd like to see change?

IDENTIFYING YOUR BARRIERS TO ACCEPTANCE We all have barriers or obstacles that prevent us from fully accepting our internal experiences. These might include beliefs like "I shouldn't feel this way" or behaviors like distracting ourselves when uncomfortable feelings arise. Reflective Exercise 1.1: Consider the barriers that stand in your way of accepting your thoughts and feelings.

Write them down in the space below. Barrier 1: Barrier 2: Barrier 3: Barrier 4: Barrier 5: Now that you've identified your barriers to acceptance, the next step is to explore ways to navigate these barriers and practice acceptance in your daily life. In the following chapters, we will delve deeper into the other principles of ACT, each of which will equip you with more tools to cultivate acceptance and psychological flexibility.

However, remember that acceptance is not a one-time event but a continuous process. It's okay if you don't feel completely comfortable with it yet - with patience, practice, and time, it will become more natural.

PRACTICING ACCEPTANCE IN DAILY LIFE Now that we have explored the concept of acceptance and reflected on your personal challenges with it, let's move on to practicing acceptance in your daily life. For the following exercise, you will choose a situation where you typically struggle with acceptance. Perhaps it's a feeling of anxiety when you're about to give a presentation, or a rush of sadness when you think about a lost loved one. The aim is not to eliminate these feelings, but to create space for them, allow them to be there without judgment, and not let them control your actions. Next time you're in this situation, take a moment to acknowledge the difficult feelings or thoughts. You can say to yourself, "I'm noticing I'm having the thought that..." or "I'm feeling..." Make space for these feelings and thoughts without trying to control or avoid them. Breathe into and around them.

Exercise:

Identify a situation where you struggle with acceptance:

Reflect on the experience: What did you notice?

How did it feel to allow these feelings and thoughts to be there?

What happened when you didn't try to avoid or control them?

COGNITIVE DEFUSION You may have noticed that thoughts come and go, much like cars on a road or leaves floating down a river. This exercise is a small step towards understanding that you are not your thoughts – a concept central to cognitive defusion.

Chapter 2:

RECOGNIZING YOUR THOUGHT PATTERNS
RECOGNIZING YOUR THOUGHT PATTERNS Welcome to Chapter 2, where we'll delve into another crucial component of Acceptance and Commitment Therapy (ACT): Cognitive Defusion. But before we dive into what cognitive defusion is, let's take a moment to talk about our thoughts. We all have thousands of thoughts each day. Some thoughts are practical, like "I need to buy milk," while others might be more evaluative, like "I did a good job in that meeting." We also have thoughts that can be quite negative and self-defeating, like "I'll never be good enough." In ACT, we don't categorize thoughts as good or bad. Instead, we focus on how we relate to our thoughts. Do we get caught up in them, seeing them as literal truths?

Or do we recognize them as mental events that may or may not be accurate?

LET'S TRY A SMALL EXERCISE For the next minute, sit quietly and observe your thoughts. What are you thinking?

How do these thoughts make you feel?

Acceptance and Commitment Therapy Workbook · information

For instance, imagine having the thought, "I'm going to fail." In a state of cognitive fusion, you might treat this thought as a fact, causing you to feel anxious and maybe even stop trying. However, with cognitive defusion, you might say, "Ah, there's that 'I'm going to fail' story again." You can see the thought as just that—a thought—not a prophecy.

For example, if you stumble over a couple of words during a presentation, you might think, "The presentation was a complete disaster," overlooking the fact that most of it went well. This thinking pattern can lead to unnecessary stress and negative self-perception. Overgeneralization: Overgeneralization is a cognitive distortion where a person comes to a general conclusion based on a single incident or piece of evidence.

For instance, if you're preparing a meal for the first time and it doesn't turn out well, overgeneralization might lead you to think, "I'm terrible at cooking, I can't make anything right," even though it's just one attempt. This distorted thinking ignores the possibility that you could improve with practice or that a single mistake doesn't define your overall ability.

This kind of thinking can lead to unnecessary worry and misunderstanding. Catastrophizing or Minimization

Catastrophizing or Minimization is a cognitive distortion where an individual either dramatically overestimates the impact of negative events (catastrophizing) or underestimates the significance or impact of positive events (minimization). For example, imagine you make a small mistake at work. If you're catastrophizing, you might think, "This will ruin my entire career."

Should Statements "Should" statements are a type of cognitive distortion where individuals impose rigid expectations on themselves or others, often leading to disappointment, frustration, or guilt. For example, a person may often think, "I should always be productive," or "I should never make mistakes." These thoughts can create unnecessary pressure and stress, because they set an unattainable standard.

COGNITIVE DISTORTIONS Labeling and Mislabeling: Labeling and Mislabeling are cognitive distortions where individuals assign fixed, global labels to themselves or others based on specific behaviors or incidents, often leading to an oversimplified and inaccurate perception. For example, if you do poorly on a test, you might label yourself as a "failure" or "stupid". This kind of labeling overlooks the complexity of human abilities and reduces you to a single characteristic based on a single event. Mislabeling involves describing an event with language that is emotionally loaded and not factually accurate.

For instance, if someone turns down your invitation to hang out, you might say they "rejected" you, even though they might simply have been busy. This could lead to feelings of rejection that are not proportional to the situation.

Personalization Personalization is a cognitive distortion where individuals take things personally or assume excessive responsibility for events that may not be directly related to them.

MINDFULNESS SCRIPT This body scan script incorporates the principles of Acceptance and Commitment Therapy (ACT). ACT emphasizes accepting your experiences as they are and committing to actions that align with your personal values. Throughout this script, you'll be guided to notice your bodily sensations without judgement, and to allow them space instead of trying to change or avoid them.

Settling in: Begin by finding a comfortable and quiet space where you can sit or lie down undisturbed. Allow yourself to settle in, gently closing your eyes if that feels comfortable for you. Grounding: Take a moment to connect with the sensation of the surface supporting you. Notice the points of contact between your body and the chair or floor. Simply notice these sensations, without trying to change anything. Breathing: Shift your focus to your breath.

Notice the rise and fall of your chest or belly as you breathe in and out. Notice the air entering and leaving your nostrils. Do not attempt to alter your breath; simply be present with it as it is. Scanning the body: Now, we will begin to scan the body. Start from the top of your head, moving down slowly to your feet. Notice any sensations that are present. You might notice warmth, coolness, tension, relaxation, or perhaps you don't notice anything at all.

All experiences are valid, and the goal is not to feel a certain way but simply to observe what is there. Accepting what is: As you move through your body, you may come across sensations that are uncomfortable or painful. Instead of trying to push these sensations away, allow them space.

Recognize that they are there and that it is okay for them to be there. This is part of the practice of acceptance, acknowledging things as they are without trying to change them. Staying present: If your mind wanders away, gently bring it back to the body scan. It is perfectly normal for the mind to wander. Each time it happens, gently and without judgment, guide your attention back to the sensation in your body.

Moving through the body: Continue moving through your body in this way, noticing, accepting and being with what is. You might move from your head to your neck, your shoulders, down through your arms and hands, your chest and back, your stomach, your hips, your legs, and finally, your feet. Reflecting on your values: As you finish the body scan, take a moment to reflect on how this practice might align with your personal values. Perhaps it aligns with a value of self-care, mindfulness, or inner peace.

Use this moment to reinforce your commitment to these values. Closing: To finish, bring your attention back to your breath. Notice how your body feels now, after the body scan.

1. Keep in view
When you're ready, gently open your eyes and take a moment to adjust to your surroundings.

2. Keep in view
Remember, the purpose of this body scan is not to feel any particular way, but to cultivate awareness and acceptance of your experiences as they are.

3. Keep in view
This script is just a guideline, feel free to adjust it to suit your needs and comfort level.

Consider for a moment your mind as the sky and your thoughts, emotions, and sensations as the weather. Reflect on this metaphor: How does it resonate with your experiences of thoughts, emotions, and sensations?

How does it feel to see yourself as the sky (the observing self), instead of the weather (your changing experiences)?

In an effort to stop the flow of junk mail, do you chase down each of the senders and yell at them?

How successful would that be if you did it?

Reflecting on times when you've naturally stepped into the role of the observing self can be a powerful way to understand this concept. Let's explore such an instance in your life. Reflective Exercise 4.3: Think about a time when you were able to observe your thoughts, feelings, or sensations without getting caught up in them. It might be a time when you noticed a thought like "I'm not good enough," but instead of believing it or fighting it, you were simply able to see it as a thought. Write down your experience and how it influenced your reaction to the situation. By recognizing these moments, you can begin to see the power of the observing self in action.

- Exercise: CULTIVATING THE OBSERVING SELF Now, let's try to cultivate our observing self with a simple exercise. Remember, this is not about
- suppressing or changing your thoughts and feelings, but about noticing them from a distance. Observing Thoughts: Close your eyes
- and take a few deep breaths. For a few
- minutes, simply observe your thoughts. Don't try to change them, just notice them. If it's helpful, you can imagine your
- thoughts as leaves floating by on a
- stream, or clouds passing in the sky. Notice how your thoughts come
- and go, just like the
- leaves or clouds. Observing Sensations: Finally, shift your attention to your physical sensations. You
- might notice the feeling of your feet on the floor, the temperature of the room, or the sensation of your breath entering
- and leaving your body. Just
- observe these sensations. Observing Feelings: Now, shift your attention to your feelings. Again, just
- observe them. You might notice feelings of
- calm, anxiety, excitement, or boredom. Whatever you're feeling, just notice it
- without trying to change it. By practicing this exercise, you can cultivate your ability to connect with your observing self. It's
- a skill that takes practice, but over time, you may find it easier to observe your thoughts, feelings, and sensations without getting caught up in them. This can provide you with a sense
- of peace and stability, even in the face of life's challenges.

Chapter 5:

UNCOVERING YOUR VALUES IDENTIFYING YOUR CORE VALUES Identifying your values isn't always a straightforward task. Often, our true values get obscured by societal expectations, pressures, or our own critical thoughts. However, getting clear on your values is a critical step in ACT as it provides you with a compass, guiding you toward a rich, full, and meaningful life. Your values are unique to you and are a reflection of what is most important in your personal and professional life. To help you start thinking about your values, consider these areas: relationships, career, health, personal growth, and leisure. What qualities or ways of being are important to you in these areas?

HOW VALUES INFLUENCE ACTIONS Once you have a clear understanding of your values, you can use them to guide your actions. This is called "committed action" in ACT, which involves taking concrete steps that align with your values. For example, if one of your values is health, a committed action might be incorporating a daily exercise routine. If kindness is a value, a committed action might be performing a random act of kindness each day. These actions may not always be easy, especially when barriers arise, but they are more fulfilling because they're aligned with what truly matters to you. In the next sections, we'll delve deeper into exploring your personal values and identifying committed actions that align with these values. This process is a key aspect of ACT, which can provide a direction and sense of purpose, even in challenging times.

SETTING GOALS ALIGNED WITH YOUR VALUES An essential part of Committed Action is setting clear, specific goals that are in line with your values. These are not like the traditional goals you might set, like losing weight or earning more money.

Instead, they are ongoing patterns of action that are driven by your values. For example, if one of your values is learning, a goal might be to read one book per month. If one of your values is family, a goal might be to spend quality time with your family without distractions at least once a week.

To maintain and enhance your psychological flexibility, let's create a long-term plan. How will you incorporate mindfulness into your everyday life?

How often will you reassess your values and ensure your actions are still aligned with them?

How frequently will you review and adjust your committed action plan?

Pre-Assessment

Acceptance and Commitment Therapy Workbook · worksheet

Pre-Assessment I feel like my life is being controlled by my worries, fears, or anxieties. I have a hard time accepting myself as I am, without judgment or criticism. I feel disconnected from my emotions or body sensations—I'm not always sure how I'm feeling. I don't feel like I'm living my life in alignment with my true self or deepest values. I have a hard time tolerating uncomfortable feelings or situations, and I often feel the urge to escape from them. Remember, the objective of this re-assessment is to provide a reflection point for you to see how far you've come. Don't judge your responses. Instead, celebrate your progress and acknowledge the journey ahead. This is just one step on the lifelong path of psychological flexibility, and every step counts. Well done!

WHERE ARE YOU NOW?

When faced with a challenging decision, I tend to act impulsively rather than pausing to consider my values.

When I'm feeling emotional pain, I often try to distract myself or "numb" the pain in some way.
